“Saltarello,” Presto, from “Italian Symphony”....Mendelssohn

Upon Mendelssohn's first visit to Italy in May, 1830, he found himself surrounded and courted by an assemblage of talent and rank. While there he wrote several brilliant and inspiring numbers, one of which was the “Italian Symphony” in A, brought to light on May 13, 1833, by the London, Philharmonic band, under the composer's direction. It is full of the southern atmosphere, and all the gay images which had settled on the composer's mind—an undying record of his Italian impressions.

“Danse Russe Trepak,” from “The Nutcraker Suite”...........

.................................................................Tschaikowsky

The Trepak is a genuine national dance of Russia, of lively and stormy character with short rhythms and persistence of form. The chief section of this particular number is built on repetitions of a period of eight measures. The subordinate section is in D major, and the basses have the melody. There is a short coda with increasing tempo till the end fff.

“Unfinished Symphony” in B minor........................Schubert

Andante Con Moto

Schubert, the greatest song writer that ever lived, wrote nine symphonies and left others in manuscript unfinished, when he died of typhoid fever at the early age of thirty-one. His works, never appreciated during his life and which he sold at very meager prices, were brought forward after his death by Schumann, Mendelssohn and Rubenstein. This lovely symphony, usually known as the “Unfinished,” was written in 1822, but only two movements were completed, the third movement (Scherzo) was just begun. It was found among the composer's papers in 1865, since which time it has been a joy to music lovers the world over.

“Bacchanale,” from Opera “Samson and Delilah”....Saint-Saens

The scene of the Bacchanale is a religious festivity in the interior of the Temple of Dagon. Samson, blind and captive, is led in and chained to the two great pillars which, in the center of the Temple support the roof. At the moment when the Bacchic dance of the devotees of Dagon reaches its most delirious excitement, Samson, by a last supreme effort, tears down the columns, killing himself and all his enemies at one stroke. The Bacchanale starts with a capricious solo for oboe, is full of quick incisive rhythms for all the groups of voices in the orchestra, grows more and more animated and frenzied as it develops, and is one of Saint-Saens most brilliantly-colored orchestral works.
